NOTE

In the preparation of Fifty Key Thinkers on the Holocaust and Genocide, the authors consulted a vast number of books, articles and websites as we strove to learn as much as we could about those being discussed, their lines of thinking and the intellectual milieu in which they worked or are working. On occasion, the best way to obtain biographical data was to contact the people themselves (wherever possible) in order to obtain from them a curriculum vitae or other such descriptive material. Upon reflection, we found it would have been next to impossible to compile anything like a comprehensive bibliography that would take into account biographical material as well as further and general reading, while at the same time retaining some form of representative integrity within the list.

We therefore concluded that instead of trying to put in everything – knowing that we could not do so within the limits imposed by the task – it would be preferable to compile a bibliography of works relative to specific thinkers that would be useful for those seeking to broaden their reading beyond the current volume. It is our hope that the list will thus be of benefit as a starting point; we make no claims as to its inclusiveness.

Of course, each of those profiled in this book have their own listing of their major works in the area of the Holocaust and/or genocide, so their writing does not appear in this list. Also, works by other authors that are referenced within the text itself are cited at the end of each entry.

The following is the list, which you have accessed here at http://www.routledge.com/books/details/9780415775519

Paul R. Bartrop
Melbourne, Victoria, Australia

Steven Leonard Jacobs
Tuscaloosa, Alabama, USA

Ball-Kaduri, Kurt Y., “Evidence of Witnesses, its Value and Limitations,” Yad Vashem Studies, 3 (1959), 79–90.

Braiterman, Zachary, “‘Hitler’s Accomplice?’: The Tragic Theology of Richard Rubenstein,” Modern Judaism, 17, 1 (February 1997), 75–89.

Brown, Robert McAfee, Elie Wiesel: Messenger to All Humanity, South Bend (IN): University of Notre Dame Press, 1984.

